First-time mothers and their partners' perceptions of infant temperament: a cross-sectional survey of 1056 Finnish families. The association between the first-time mother's personality and the temperament of her child, as perceived by the father, was examined in a cross-sectional survey of 1056 Finnish families in 1999. Mothers and fathers completed the Temperament in Youngsters Inventory (TINY) separately. Mothers' scores on each subscale of the TINY were positively associated with their partners' scores on that subscale. The strongest association was found for the following subscales: tough-mindedness, rigid orderliness, and social sensitivity. These findings suggest that temperamental characteristics of the mother tend to remain evident in her child's behavior after pregnancy and that, despite the impact of breastfeeding and other maternal and infant influences, these characteristics remain relatively constant during the first year of life., and you're sure to gain a rich variety of knowledge from those inside.
