Epidermal hyperplasia, an early feature of squamous cell carcinoma (SCC), is associated with a high frequency of aberrant DNA hypermethylation. In this study, we show that this hypermethylation is replicated in lung tumor cells derived from the A/J and FVB/N mouse strains, whereas it is not observed in methylation-deficient mice (129X1/SvJ) bearing human SCCs. The frequency of hypermethylation was also high in alveolar SCC cells derived from A/J mice, which are non-tumor-bearing. As the development of human alveolar SCC is influenced by genetic background, it is possible that human alveolar SCC hypermethylation is also heritable. To test this hypothesis, DNA was extracted from both skin and lung tumor samples, and the methylation status of three repetitive sequences (AC3, MS-1, and D4Z1) was determined. These sequences were hypermethylated in 90%, 86%, and 94% of skin SCC samples derived from A/J, 129X1/SvJ, and FVB/N mice, respectively. The methylation status of AC3 and MS-1 sequences was similar in the skin samples (mean 8.8% versus 8.2%). In contrast, only 31% of the lung samples from A/J mice bore hypermethylation of these
